The Boundaries of Universal Knowledge: Between Phenomenology and Psychoanalysis (lecture)

Reza Rokoe Haghghi, PhD.
(visiting research fellow)

Abstract:

In the history of thinking, psychology was a part of philosophy until the end of the 19th century, although it sought to transcend it and contribute to universal knowledge, to Wissenschaft, as an independent science. The 20th century revived the very notion of science through two opposing disciplines, psychoanalysis and phenomenology, the first of which has come to the foreground of the development of thought in our own time. Is it not time for phenomenology to respond to it?
